

CJP Protest and the Rise of Pop Governance

An Essay in Speculative Political Philosophy

By Anviksha Singh

There's only two types of people in the world
The ones that entertain, and the ones that observe

- The legendary Miss Britney Spears

As the protesting fervor of the nation is finally at rest, it becomes worthwhile to assess the real impact of the following events with political sobriety. As the nation now rests with its lathi-charged students and the resigned education minister, we must open our eyes to a fact much bigger than the whole protest: the eminent rise of pop governance. A situation now showing the real possibility of politics becoming entertainment altogether, where the strategy now dismantles the traditional explanation of social administration into a pure, corporate-funded spectacle. The way I understand the dynamics of the protest is through the framework, "display, dissent, dialogue." The protest was an orchestrated phenomenon by an Indian public relations student at Boston University, "Abhijit Dipke," whose alma mater proves his media competence, joined by another media figure, Sonam Wangchuk. While Dipke remains an opportunistic figure empowered by media control, Wangchuk is a much more seasoned and cemented media figure, immortalized by the 2009 culturally iconic film 3 Idiots and the recent years of environmentalism and self-determination in Ladakh. It comes to our attention that such a national figure of scientific merit and educational awareness, celebrated 17 years ago, has recently come to fulfill his subliminal destiny in 2026 for the NEET protest. The malignant level of exam management in India is a deeply devastating issue affecting millions of lives, whose culprits go beyond the immediate privately funded and irresponsibly evil testing agencies to the systemic crunch of our children's souls. The crunch that keeps the brunt of our Nanny State's education system a living horror, enticing generations into social mobility and Macaulay education. The white man's burden is now on the shoulders of our children, who match neck to neck with the bottlenecks of the American job market. The rhetoric falls short of the mass-controlling tactics of the authoritarian global state via an anti-creativity and anti-spirituality education system built to sustain materialism for the struggling proletariat and to reserve its esoteric techniques of consciousness for the global elite.

"Sir! What Number 1, sir? Here we don't talk about new ideas. Or about new inventions! We only talk about getting good grades, or a good job in the USA. We don't gain any knowledge here, Sir. They only teach us how to bring back good grades here." - Rancho.

Yet I would like to bottle my rage here for a pertinent issue of representation, which is discursive to existing identity politics and leans toward the conspiratorial. The general discourse baffles the bias of historical representation and its privileges, which enable the actual position of a culture and its entities to attain legitimacy and tradition. Yet, for the particular premise we are dealing with, I would like to add the newfound revelations from Hollywood, the global elite, subliminal media signals, and the growing fascination with cybernetics, an alternative yet deeply conjunct to the existing discourse: the idea of a "hidden order." The idea of a globally existing platform for powerful individuals and families controlling global capital, and thus the flow and nature of history (an idea of historical materialism often toyed with by Marxists), allows for a controlled and predictable representation of a culture and its entities. Owing to this understanding, we can provisionally work with the idea that the star media personalities of the protest are indeed the chosen insignias of the era's great dissent, displayed across the legacy media houses and social media pages as the "men of history" and the "voice of accountability." The reasons why the following individuals were chosen for the following protest remain as speculative as the ones choosing them; however, we do have a few strings to pull together in a web of causality. To begin with, as the display of the media buzzword, very common amongst Gen Z (yet another corporate identity given to the natural demographic profile of India's young population to drive and elicit a common cultural response stereotypical of semi-American standards of consumerism and liberalism), "accountability," Wangchuk's media credentials seemed superimposing. If one closely looks at the plot of his most blockbuster credential, 3 Idiots, we see a recurring pattern of class struggle, identity impersonation, education scams, elitism, and the eventual rise of curiosity over rote learning (a possible hint at education reforms). All of the problems faced by the majority of Indian students, even after two decades of the film's release, subliminally answer Chatur's bet of meeting ten years later as a moronic frown upon the administration. The choice of Wangchuk as the star of the protest reveals the poetic destiny of Rancho Das, the carefree genius and engineering icon fasting to claim his legitimacy in a system disowning its own beneficiaries. The choice seems a marketing masterstroke at many levels, as we infer from the plot how, at the moment of the true identity of Ranchoddas, we see the dialectic of class struggle infiltrating the education system, which might be a possible dig at caste reservation, as opposed to the narrative that "reservation hurts true talent." This stands even more fitting with the present escalation of the movement against caste reservation online, as many pages have renewed their display as "anti-casteism and anti-reservation."

Now, as the "display" component of my framework has been substantiated through examples, I should refer to a definition here. If we consider that the global state wishes to converge politics into a differently abled version of entertainment as a method to divert public convictions and attention toward topics not meddling with its agendas of global control and sustained economic slavery through centralized banking and uncertain job markets, then the following framework is employed in politics to appeal to a wider audience. This appeal fuels market disruptions, public entertainment via memes, videos, and political hooliganism. The framework is a dynamic overplay of display (state-proposed/imposed thesis), dissent (antithesis or opposition), and dialogue (the state of fluid dialectic between the state and the public to further the materialistic dialectic into a synthesis posing as historical contingency for endless cycles). In other words, digging one's grave to debate with the corpse over the color of its cenotaph while the debate essentially remains oblivious to the hidden reality that the corpse is, in fact, dead and that the debate furnishes no utility. But why debate? Because this situation turns our attention away from the reason for death, the one supplying the colors to the cenotaph and the business around it. Thus, the dialectic framework, as much as it leaves a giant scope for intellectual gymnasium, historical reinterpretation, political doublespeak, propaganda, wars, and all the tricks of the trade, is actually a divine opportunity for entertainment. Here, entertainment assumes a new ardor of intellectualism, the poetry of "good faith," and endless births and deaths of comedians, authors, actors, and singers who would pose as the brave epitome of anti-dialectic to state-led oppression.

"Hum logo ko hasa rahe hai, agar log hasna band kardenge na toh sawal uthana shuru kar denge"

- Samay Raina

This machinery transmogrifies into a beast breathing millions of dollars per minute on television, a tapestry of hidden contracts and deals, and the ultimate detractor of public conscience while pleading its allegiance to its "bravest stars" with a massive fortune. That's how a star is born. No wonder all royal British events would televise an averagely talented singer shaking their body as the "reptilians" rejoice, the Ivy League hiring and mythologizing media literacy and economics experts like Noam Chomsky and Larry Summers, who would also die in shame as their names appeared on the infamous Epstein list, the pop industry's most sexualized icons in election propaganda, and the subliminal or explicit political commentary online.

Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;
Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere
The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
The best lack all conviction, while the worst
Are full of passionate intensity.

- W.B. Yeats, The Second Coming

All point towards the planted dialectic icons, either by direct or indirect means, but prove the overall entertaining potential of politics now being unleashed rapidly. While the examples here are mostly Western, Indian politics is currently experiencing its metamorphosis from empty promises to entertaining promises. This successfully generates rounds of dissent on a semi-political entertaining thesis and keeps nourishing itself into a memorable marketing event: the ultimate conclusion. Now, when applied to the situation of the Wangchuk-Dipke alliance, we saw one of the most profitable protests ever, which led to the establishment of more careers than it ended (only one, I suppose, who is likely to retire in his mansion soon). The flooding disposal of local dancers, singers, lip-syncers, writers, comics, doctors, adult industry stars, and even the lavish NRI nationalists into one frame was breathtaking, literally. This protest provided the psychological space of dissent, a vicious mix of genuine despair against the ruthless system and the opportunistic cabal of the profiting plants. This was the overall scenario of the protest, roping together India's most media-exposed generation, whose political awareness, built on pop-cultural narratives, economic instability, global connectivity, and consumerism, was psychologically trained into the language and method of dissenting dialectic for the coming decades, as the famed New World Order would be rolled out as a "logical option" to global governance.

The reason why the current establishment uses the word "anti-national" as a rebuking binary to "accountability" (you can see the attrition of dialectic via the linguistic choices) is because it expresses its rising paranoia due to the erosion of state power in a global capitalist order and its own people seeking opportunities within it. The traditional past is now the ground of "reform," and the idea of a reformative Indian becomes synonymous with, and logical to, the unsaid rules of the "global state" already. When coupled with an addiction to entertainment, the process becomes a circus. So, the figures, Dipke and Wangchuk, are politically determined and media-trained professionals. However diverse their portfolios might seem, and speaking clearly on the conspiratorial end, if we consider the activism of the Ladakhi scientist, whose father was previously in politics and has often been linked to the self-determination of Ladakh, we might assume that there indeed is a "hidden order" at display.

The protest issue reached the hands of international environmentalist and Swedish activist "Greta Thunberg," expressing her solidarity with Indian students, displaying the global activist network notorious for multiple instances of shady activities. (Ghislaine Maxwell was allowed to speak at the UN as the representative of civil society and was a contributor to a foundation for protecting kids, showing the dual nature of the global activist network.) Interestingly, like Wangchuk, Greta also comes from wealth (her parents belong to the entertainment class) and walked in the footsteps of her mother, who apparently was a glamorous mezzo-soprano singer who cut down on her air travel to reduce carbon emissions, like Wangchuk's father, Sonam Wangyal, who fasted unto death in a 1984 hunger strike in Leh to demand Scheduled Tribe status for Ladakh.

These striking similarities prove discordant to the 3 Idiots plot of class struggle when placed opposite Wangchuk, highlighting a possible subliminal message that Sonam Wangchuk is itself a media-lauded impersonation of some other identity. If we keep the film's subliminal messaging and the Thunberg comparison side by side to predict the future, keeping the entertainment-to-politics ratio constant as it is right now, we might come across a time when the people or protesters (the film's equivalent of Farhan Qureshi, who symbolizes the frustrated and misguided protesters wishing for "creativity," and Raju Rastogi, representing the fearful and underconfident students wishing for "true spirituality" in the education system) follow the figure of Wangchuk or Rancho to find his present whereabouts. They might realize he is not the real Rancho (the identity impersonation of an activist) and that he indeed is found in Ladakh itself, where, like Greta, he will be carrying out his educational reforms via the state's self-determination, thus carrying the baton of his father.

Surprisingly, the claims of Wangchuk's identity as Rancho are already being heavily questioned publicly, and his covert political motives are under fire due to the sensationalist support by Mehbooba Mufti at Jantar Mantar. The truth is already getting out, and the future is much closer than we think.

"We have seen this spectacle for the first time (in Delhi). We have seen it in Kashmir for the last many years. There is militancy there and it is understandable (wahan militancy hai, uska ek banta hai). There are militants on one side and security forces on the other. But here, there are no militants, and they have no guns or stones in their hands,"

- Mehbooba Mufti, CJP Protest

Now, you might wonder what an international public relations student, starting a protest by feeding on the online machinery of virality, has to do with the current scenario. The answer lies in his skill in media and marketing, harnessing all major international news agencies, from BBC to Al Jazeera, into a globalist allegiance to the hidden order of the cabal, training the Indian psyche for the upcoming years of subservience in the New World Order. I would like to substantiate the following allegation by the dubious origins of Dipke, whose LinkedIn account has been recently deleted, a platform most valuable for seeing one's track record, raising eyebrows about his possible forged links. Nevertheless, the protest proliferated into a massive beast of its own, gnawing countless legacy political leaders, boys from wealthy families, some dancing legends, and untrained journalists, issuing the nation into a global spectacle of dissent once again.

Lastly, what does the protest signify in its synthesis? Well, yet another round of eternalizing entertainment, with the statesman, batsman, and Batman making reels, the much-hyped resignation, and the stage set for the new round of radicalizing display of dissent: Prahlad Joshi's takeover. Now, more posts and reels are made to criticize, proctor, count, and discount each other's cusses, the swerve of the dancers' hips, the taste of the mass-ordered protest burgers, and the tone of the voices. All is extremely well with this immortal corporate machinery, which will continue to start and end countless careers and let more poets, dancers, singers, and actors enter Parliament, squash litres of laughter into our bloodstream with their public antics and controversies. Because entertainment must go on while our children toil in the same system, our banks fail with more NPAs, and the environment rots into a polluted hell. If the nation truly aspires to a sovereign Indian state with a healthy dialogue, then it must realize that while declarative victories lie in winning the dialectic, liberation is post-dialectic.

To oppose is good, to dismantle is divine.

तू ख्वाब है या है धोका
ठगनी हैं या कोई माया
हैं तू नचनी नाच नचावे
तुझे कोई समझ न पाया
तेरी नज़रों की धार तीखी तीखी है कतार
जो भी देखे वो तो गया बस मारा (उफ़)

- Tauba Tauba, Song by Kailash Kher

A Note to the Reader

This essay was never intended to be a work of reportage, investigative journalism, or a conventional political commentary. Countless analyses already document the immediate facts, chronology, and ideological positions surrounding contemporary political events. Repeating them was neither the purpose nor the ambition of this work. Instead, this essay approaches politics through the traditions of speculative political philosophy, media criticism, symbolic interpretation, and conspiracy theory as a philosophical mode of inquiry. Its purpose is not to establish the factual certainty of every conjecture it presents, but to examine how political spectacles are constructed, represented, consumed, and internalized. Many of the associations and arguments developed here are interpretive rather than demonstrable. They are intended to provoke reflection rather than demand agreement. If this essay succeeds, it does so not by persuading the reader to adopt another ideology, but by encouraging a greater degree of caution before embracing any ideology altogether. Its central concern is not what to think about political events, but how one arrives at thinking about them in the first place.
